Excerpt: ... ed in the same manner, and by the same merchant, that I was, who had the money before-hand; but we never discovered to him the remainder of our intrigue, as not being willing to risk the danger there was in so doing. CHAPTER XIV. The Adventures of ike Captive continued. Our renegade had in a fortnights time bought a very good bark, capable of carrying above thirty people; and to give no suspicion of any other design, he undertook a voyage to a place upon the coast called Sargel, about thirty leagues to the eastward of Algiers towards Oran, where there is a great trade for dried figs. He made his voyage two or three times in company with the Tagarin Moor his partner. Those Moors are called in Barbary Ta, garins, who were driven out of Arragon; as they call those of Granada, Mudajares; and the same in the kingdom of Fez ara called Elches, and are the best soldiers that prince has. Every time he passed with his bark along the coast, he used to cast anchor in a little bay that was not above two bow-shot from the garden where Zoraida expected us; and there he used to exercise the Moors that rowed, either in making the Sala, which is a ceremony among them, or in some other employment; by which he practised in jest what be was resolved to execute in earnest. So sometimes he would go to the garden of Zoraida and beg some fruit, and her father would give him some, though he did not know him. He had a mind to find an occasion to speak to Zoraida, and tell her, as he since owned to me, that he was the man who by my order was to carry her to the land of the Christians, and that she might depend upon it; but he could never get an opportunity of doing it, because the
