

Conscience - Volume 4

During the first years of his sojourn in Paris, Saniel had published in a Latin Quarter review an article on the Pharmacy of Shakespeare--the poison of Hamlet, and of Romeo and Juliet; and although since his choice of medicine he read but little besides books of science, at that time he was obliged to study the plays of his author. From this study there lingered in his memory a phrase that for ten years had not risen to his lips, and which all at once forced itself uppermost in his mind with exasperating persistency. It was the words of Macbeth: Macbeth does murder sleep, the innocent sleep; Sleep, that knits up the ravelled sleeve of care, The death of each day's life, sore labors bath, Balm of hurt minds. He also had lost it, the innocent sleep, sore labors bath, balm of hurt minds. He had never been a great sleeper; at least he had accustomed himself to the habit, hard at first, of passing only a few hours in bed. But he employed these few hours well, sleeping as the weary sleep, hands clenched, without dreaming, waking, or moving; and the thought that occupied his mind in the evening was with him on waking in the morning, not having been put to flight by others, any more than by dreams.
